 JOHN SMITH'S THEORY

By FRANK FILSON.

(Copyright, 1915, by W. G. Chapman.) He felt pretty gloomy all the way down to his office. He had begun to earn enough income the year before, as a lawyer in the little manufacturing town, to justify him in claiming Mollie, whom he had loved since he entered college, as his wife. But the struggle was a hard one, and he had only just been able to keep his home together.

Then, a month previously, the Adamson company had invited several of the town lawyers to apply for a salaried position as adviser. The choice had really narrowed down to two: himself and Herbert Johnson. And he knew in his heart that Johnson was slated for the position. If mere learning had counted, he might have got it. But there were other qualities. Johnson was a manabout-town, a frequenter of the best hotel, where he dined and met people. John Smith, honest, straightforward young American that he was, would not have considered himself justified in dining out, even with Mollie, while his income was in its present condition. Then Johnson was one of the best dressed men in town. All Smith's clothing money went to dress Mollie.

But, most important of all, Johnson was acquiring a reputation as a man who took hard cases. The Adamson corporation would undoubtedly prefer a man who was willing to attempt to drive through the law, if it could be done, to a lawyer who had his own ridiculous scruples. In fact he knew that he was more or less a laughingstock among the business men of the town on account of this quality.

"However," he said to Mollie, "I believe there is a good future for a lawyer whose honesty will be so generally recognized that it will go far toward winning him every case in which he appears."

And she had agreed. But that did not help him toward the $2,000 posttion with the Adamson corporation. And that income, in addition to his other work, loomed larger and larger as the days went by.

Then he was stunned to receive an invitation to call upon the corpora-

In his best suit, which Johnson would have scorned to wear, except for gardening, perhaps, he made his vay to the big factory downtown and was shown into the room of the president, George Adamson, a fussy looking old gentleman, who bade him sit down and examined him with a very critical gaze.

But Mr. Adamson thawed perceptibly when his visitor answered the searching questions that he put to him. There John Smith knew that he was on safe ground. His credentials were certainly better than Johnson's. and Adamson acknowledged himself. as highly pleased.

"Now let us come to practical deinventor out in Dayton has a patent that we are very anxious to secure. It is an improved method of manufacturing gas furnaces, and if we had it it would cut the cost of production 15 per cent. The old man is a crank and has an inflated value of his property. He won't sell for less than a million, which would mean no extra profit to us for three years. Morally we are justified in taking his patent and magufacturing according to its specifications, for the good of the country. It is intolerable that one know that he could not hope to find the money to sue. Anyway, the case would run for years, and all the while we could be manufacturing. Very well! But now, suppose he moved for an injunction to prevent us manufacturing while the suit was pending. How would you go about stopping it?"
"Pay him his million dollars or stop manufacturing," answered Smith

Old Adamson glared at him. "You mean?"-he bellowed.

"That I would not be a party to such a case," answered Smith. "No doubt you can find men who would. I am afraid I am not the man you need. Good-day, sir." And he walked out of the office.

"You'll hear from us tomorrow!" he heard the irate old man bellow after him. But the threat passed over his head. An hour later he was telling Mollie all about it.

"Dear, you did just right," she said. But he saw the tears which she vainly tried to conceal, and presently she was weeping unreservedly upon his knees. And his head was awhiri 37 with thoughts of going into medicine, or architecture, or some other profes-sion. For there seemed no opening for an honest man in the law.

The next morning when he saw a letter from the Adamson people beside his plate he remembered the president's threat. He laughed scornfully as he opened it. What could the old man do? If he threatened him he would promptly bring suit for damages, or defamation of character. He, John Smith, did not intend to allow that old ruffian to ride roughshod over 1.50 He opened the envelope. Next mo-1.50 ment he dropped the letter with a cry.

1.50 "Mollie! He's offered me the job!" 1.50 he cried in exultation. Then: 1.50 "But I can't take it, dear. I wouldn't

1.50 work for such people."
1.50 "Let me read it, dear," said hi: practical wife.

She took up the letter and read it. Then, silently, she laid it before her 1.50 husband.

1.50 "Dear Sir," he read, "We shall con-1.50 sider ourselves fortunate if you will 1.50 consent to act as our legal represen-1.50 tative at a salary of $2,000 for the 1.50 first year.
